

Report condemns booze advertising to youngsters

There is too much alcohol advertising in Australia and it's affecting children, according to complainants to the Alcohol Advertising Review Board (AARB).

Most people complained that the regulation of alcohol marketing is so weak in Australia that alcohol advertisements are being seen on school buses, across from primary schools and before children's videos on YouTube.

The report, released today by the Public Health Advocacy Institute of WA (PHAIWA) based at Curtin University, found almost two-thirds of complaints made to the AARB over the past seven years had raised concerns about the placement of alcohol marketing in Australia.

The report found that 760 of the total 1126 complaints were about where alcohol marketing was placed in the community.

Of the 760 placement-related complaints, almost 40 per cent raised concerns that the advertisements were placed where young people were likely to be exposed or with content that would appeal to them.

The report highlights the need for governments to introduce stronger restrictions to better protect children and young people from exposure to alcohol marketing.

The report called 'Impossible to escape: The need for stronger restrictions on the placement of alcohol marketing in Australia' was compiled by the Alcohol Programs Team at PHAIWA in partnership with Cancer Council WA.

Ms Julia Stafford, from the Alcohol Programs Team at PHAIWA, said the report highlights the inadequate regulation of the placement of alcohol marketing in Australia, adding immediate action needs to be taken by governments to reduce the harm from alcohol in the community. "Young people are regularly exposed to alcohol advertising and this can influence their beliefs and attitudes about drinking," Ms Stafford said. "By reviewing the complaints made to the AARB, the report highlights that a 15-year-old Australian child could be exposed to alcohol marketing through Facebook, YouTube, Instagram, billboards, on public transport, at the supermarket, on television, and in the cinema all in one day.

"With the election looming, there are opportunities for the incoming Federal Government to take action to better protect young people.

This includes removing the exemption in the Commercial Television Industry Code of Practice that allows alcohol advertisements to be broadcast during sports programming on weekends and public holidays. There is also an urgent need to replace the self-regulatory alcohol advertising system with independent, legislated controls that cover the volume, content, and placement of all forms of alcohol marketing."

The report also recommends that state, territory, and local governments should remove alcohol advertising from public transport vehicles and transit stops, on sporting fields, stadiums, billboards and other outdoor advertising locations.

Ms Melissa Ledger, Cancer Prevention and Research Director from Cancer Council WA, said children are being bombarded with alcohol advertising that portrays alcohol as desirable and aspirational.

"Alcohol is a major risk factor for cancer, not an everyday normal product as the advertising would suggest.

We must do more to protect kids from this constant exposure as clearly industry self-regulation is not working," Ms Ledger said.

Bruce's selfless acts an example to others

With National Volunteer Week around the corner, Cannington's local altruists are looking to remind the community why they do what they do.

An event that celebrates the range of people who serve in a multitude of volunteer roles, there's plenty of opportunities open to those interested as well.

Willetton resident Bruce Corkhill is the manager of security at Sir Charles Gardner Hospital, which has over 600 beds and 5000 people.

Not just satisfied with the one role, though, Mr Corkhill has taken it upon himself to also operate as a Justice of the Peace for the multitudes of people who require his service.

"A lot of people need documents signed or witnessed," he said. "The documents vary from Enduring Power of Attorney to family court matters or certifying documents for staff.

"The local police also need Justices of the Peace regularly and visit often. "Assisting people is something I enjoy and knowing I am providing a service to these people who in most cases are patients or relatives of patients who are dealing with medical issues themselves or their loved ones are dealing with medical issues."

Having been a volunteer now for 27 years, Mr Corkhill said it has been a constant pleasure to serve the community, one which he is looking forward to getting into more once he retires.

"Volunteers are an integral part of all communities everywhere," he said.

"Having volunteers, regardless of whatever role they perform, is essential to the foundation of communities and work areas. Without volunteers a lot of services would not survive."

National Volunteer Week runs from May 20 to 26.
